② Read the text then do the tasks below. (12p.)

When you ask young people today what job they want to do in the future, you often hear answers like doctor, teacher, or police officer. These traditional jobs are still important and respected. But the job market is changing quickly, and new opportunities are appearing every year. Some jobs will disappear, others will change, and completely new ones will be created.

One area that is growing very fast is technology. Jobs such as software developer, IT security specialist, or data analyst are in high demand. Companies and governments need people who understand computers, the internet, and artificial intelligence. Technology is part of almost every business today, from supermarkets to banks. Many of these jobs offer flexible working conditions, like working from home, and good salaries. However, they also require strong problem-solving skills and lifelong learning, because technology never stands still.

Another field with a strong future is healthcare. Populations are getting older, and more people need care. Nurses, physiotherapists, and doctors are always needed. But new healthcare jobs are appearing as well, for example medical technicians who work with modern machines, or app developers who create health programs for smartphones. Working in healthcare can be stressful because of long hours and responsibility, but it is also very rewarding. People in this sector say the best part of the job is helping others directly.

Environmental jobs are also becoming more important. With climate change, societies are searching for experts in renewable energy, sustainable farming, and environmental protection. Wind turbine technicians and solar panel installers are among the fastest-growing jobs worldwide. Governments are also investing in green projects, which means more opportunities for young people who want to combine work with protecting the planet.

At the same time, many traditional jobs will not disappear but will change. A car mechanic today also needs to know about electric cars and digital systems. Farmers use drones and apps to monitor their fields. Teachers use online platforms to reach students, and even hairdressers now use social media to advertise their work.

So, what does this mean for young people? The most important skills are flexibility and a willingness to learn new things. The job you start with might not be the one you keep for the rest of your life. In fact, many people today change jobs several times in their career. But with curiosity, creativity, and hard work, you can always find your place in the future world of work.
