COVID-19 may only be the beginning of global pandemics – a future scenario in which climate change may also play a role. A recent study paints a picture of a future where pandemics become more numerous.

What we are seeing looks very much like an acceleration of pandemics. Causes include 5 deforestation, densely populated cities and markets where living animals are sold.

But climate change's possible role is complicated: We know that the virus survives longer in cold temperatures than hot, so that could mean that a warmer planet would slow the spread of the disease. On the other hand, heat waves cause people to spend more time indoors in air-conditioned spaces, where the spread of the disease increases.

- 10 In addition, the diseases that worry us most globally and that are worsened by climate change are the ones spread by mosquitoes, since mosquitoes like it hot and wet – conditions that are becoming increasingly common because of global warming.
