Children aged five to 16 spend an average of six and a half hours a day in front of a screen, more than twice as much as they did 20 years ago.

Debate about the effects of the culture on young people – sexting, bullying, mental health and cyber addiction – has never been livelier. While many young people recognise the problem, they don't question their choices.

So what happens when you ask a group of techloving teens to switch off for a week? The Disconnect project did that with a group of 15-yearolds from Capital City Academy in London.

"At first the students were against it," says Llewellyn. "But the more they considered it, the more interesting the idea of disconnecting became. Once we started looking at what they'd done the previous week, and how much time they'd spend on their smartphones and games, they were horrified."

Girls were on their phones from the moment they woke up until they went to bed – they even slept with them by their side. Boys used social media less, but they spent up to six hours a day gaming.

More importantly, all of them said they got something out of it. "I watched TV with my friends," says one. "I read a book. I can't remember the last time I did that", adds another. "I got my homework in on time and hung out much more with my family." They also reported going to bed earlier – lack of sleep being a related and growing area of concern.

The author states their various activities on the internet are affecting students in negative ways.

The writer introduces a project carried out at a school in London that asked students to turn off their phones for a week.

Although boys and girls are using their devices for different purposes, they are both equally drawn to them.

According to the author, media consumption among young people is increasing.

Shocked by their own media consumption, the students were willing to participate in the project.
